

GHS COMPLIANCE TRAINING PROGRAM

Train your employees on changes to chemical labels and safety data sheets

Under OSHA's hazard communication standard (29 CFR 1910.1200), businesses that use or store hazardous chemicals must train their employees on how to properly read chemical labels and chemical safety data sheets. OSHA has revised its standard to adopt the Globally Harmonized System of chemical labeling and hazard communication (GHS). All businesses covered by the hazard communication standard must train their employees on changes to chemical labels and safety data sheets by no later than December 1st, 2013. Failure to comply with OSHA's hazard communication standard, including mandatory training requirements, can result in fines up to $7,000 per violation.

The mandatory GHS training must include information to help employees understand how to read new GHS chemical labels (including pictograms) and what chemical safety information is included on new chemical safety data sheets (SDS). Training must be in a format that employees can easily understand, and employers must document their training efforts to demonstrate proof of compliance if inspected.

Who Needs It

Any business that uses or stores hazardous chemicals must comply with the GHS training requirement. Most work environments (doctor's offices, dental offices, restaurants, manufacturing, construction, auto repair shops, etc) have at least one chemical present that may be covered by OSHA's standard. Common chemicals include paints, oils, inks, fuels, industrial-strength cleaning supplies, medicines, etc.
